Question No: 01

The classical approach to public administration probably reached its fullest development in the United States during the 1930s. Since that time, through educational and training programs, technical assistance, and the work of international organizations, it has also become a standard doctrine in many other countries too. However, some of its elements were resisted by governments with British or continental-legal perspectives, and even during the 1930s it was being challenged by many from several quarters. Since that time, the study of the subject has greatly developed. It has also become somewhat confused as a result of certain inconsistencies in approach.

The orthodox doctrine rested on the premise that administration was simply the implementation of public policies determined by others. According to this view, administrators should seek maximum efficiency but should be otherwise neutral about values and goals. During the Great Depression of the 1930s, and even more so during World War II, however, it became increasingly evident that many new policies originated within the administration, that policy and value judgments were implicit in most significant administrative decisions, that many administrative officials worked on nothing except policy, and that, insofar as public policies were controversial, such work inevitably involved administrators in politics.

The supposed independence of administration from policy and politics was seen to be illusory. Since the 1930s there has thus been increasing concern with policy formation and the development of techniques to improve policy decisions. Although the concept of a value-free, neutral administration is regarded by many as no longer tenable, no fully satisfactory substitute has been offered. How to ensure that responsible and responsive policy decisions are made by career administrators, and how to coordinate their work with the policies of politically elected or appointive officials, remain key preoccupations, especially in democratic states.

It was with governmental efforts to combat the Depression that new informational devices were introduced, including National Income Accounting and the scrutiny of Gross National Product as a major index of Economic Health. The applied techniques of fiscal and Monetary Policy have become established specializations of public administration. Economists occupy key posts in the administrations of most nations, and many other administrators must have at least elementary knowledge of the economic implications of government operations. France, Sweden and other Scandinavian nations, Great Britain, and the United States were among the leaders in developing Economic Planning Techniques. Already, such planning has become a dominating concern of Public Administration in many of the developing countries.
